
Abstract

Word sense ambiguity poses a great challenge in producing high quality translation output even in a relatively limited domain. In this paper, we propose a word sense disambiguation technique implemented in an operational interlingua-based machine translation system and applied to a military domain. The technique utilizes semantic tagging and selectional preference statistics obtained from the parsed corpus, and can be easily ported to other domains and is extendable to understanding-based information retrieval.